'Never-Ending Man: Hayao Miyazaki'

The animator Hayao Miyazaki in "Never-Ending Man." by Gláds

The Japanese animated movie maker Hayao Miyazaki, who has created many popular movies like "My Neighbor Totoro," "Castle in the Sky" and the Oscar-winning "Spirited Away," is an artist who always likes to put in everything he had when he is creating. Also, 33. As such, he has said to the public that he planned to retire more than once over the past forty years of his career. But he came back and made one more movie each time. However, after he finished the 2013 movie "The Wind Rises," Miyazaki, now 77, seemed to make up his mind to put a stop to his work. In 2014 he closed his offices at Studio Ghibli, the animated movie company he built in 1985.

A documentary, "Never-Ending Man: Hayao Miyazaki" in 2016, shows you a hard-working Hayao Miyazaki making coffee, thinking and drawing in his house. In the documentary, you can see that Miyazaki still has a strong feeling about creating art. But he worries that today people like to make movies by using C.G.I. technology and it makes his hand-drawn movies look very out of date. He said he thought about 34. And he asked some good computer animated movie makers to work with him and they made a short movie together. However, Miyazaki could not agree with their ideas at all. After the short movie failed, Miyazaki came to two conclusions: Hand-drawn animated movies is the only thing for him, and 35. Miyazaki's newest movie is being prepared now, and I can't wait!
