In 1998, six-year-old Ryan heard that in Africa many children who drank dirty water got sick and died. He made up his mind to help them. He worked very hard at home and for his neighbors, and made his first seventy dollars. He wanted to use the money to build wells in Africa. But the money was far less than the cost of digging a well. Newspapers in Canada began to report about his efforts to raise money. People who read this sent him money. Ryan finally raised three thousand dollars, and his first well was built in the year 1999. In the next ten years, Ryan's well project raised more than $1.5 million from the public. The money helped to build over 300 wells that gave clean drinking water to half a million people. From Ryan's well project, people learn a lesson: Even a kid who has a simple dream can make a big change in the world.

(二)The Story of Post-it Notes

Post-it notes play an important part in modern life. They are seen in offices, at school, and at home. But who invented them?

Art Fry, a famous scientist in the USA, sang in church every Sunday. He liked to mark his pages in the song book with small pieces of paper. But they kept falling out. He was often mad because of that. One day, an idea came into Art's mind. He talked to Spencer Silver, another scientist that Art worked with. After that, Art decided to use a special glue which Spencer invented.

Art brushed the glue on the back of his bookmarks and found they worked well. These "bookmarks" were also great for writing notes. Soon post-it notes appeared on the market. Today post-it notes are used and enjoyed everywhere. The trouble Art used to have is no longer a problem for you and me.
